Excerpt: . chapter iii. geology, etc. The village of Bacton is situated in a valley, encompassed on both sides by rising land. Its cliffs do not extend to a greater height than twenty feet above the surface of the beach; while those of Happisburgh, Paston, and Mundesley rise from fifty to one hundred feet. The cliffs generally consist of clay, sand, and loam. By some writers they have been termed Mud Cliffs, from their dark colour and general appearance. Mr. Lyell includes them in a series called the Boulder Formation. Mr. Woodward, in his Outline of the Geology of Norfolk, considers them to be of diluvial origin, but upon close inspection they are found to contain strata and fossils which partake of the characters, and may be ascribed to various parts of the tertiary period. The cliffs form part of an extensive series extending from Happisburgh lighthouses to Weybourne, north-west of Cromer, comprising a distance of about twenty miles, and are supposed continuously to rest upon chalk. In some places the cliffs are very regularly stratified, presenting, at various parts, immense layers of red and white sand; but in other places they are wholly devoid of stratification, exhibiting one continuous mass of till. The till prevails extensively near Happisburgh and Mundesley, and occupies often nearly the whole extent of the cliff. The following division will give a pretty correct idea of the position of the various strata. r 1 Brown clay, containing bones of the...
